A researcher found Google's AI Studio faking data deletion. Google's bug bounty programme banned him for reporting it — in 60 seconds.

The bug itself: when users deleted their data, AI Studio returned a fake 404, the page that tells you something is gone. The data was not gone. The interface was performing deletion rather than doing it.

The response is the story. His submission to the Vulnerability Reward Programme triggered an automated ban within a minute, before any human reviewed it. The system that exists to surface exactly this kind of problem removed the person who surfaced it.

Bug bounty programmes run on automation now because the submission volume is enormous. But an auto-ban is
